

Early Journal Content on JSTOR, Free to Anyone in the World

This article is one of nearly 500,000 scholarly works digitized and made freely available to everyone in the world by JSTOR.

Known as the Early Journal Content, this set of works include research articles, news, letters, and other writings published in more than 200 of the oldest leading academic journals. The works date from the mid-seventeenth to the early twentieth centuries.

We encourage people to read and share the Early Journal Content openly and to tell others that this resource exists. People may post this content online or redistribute in any way for non-commercial purposes.

Read more about Early Journal Content at <http://about.jstor.org/participate-jstor/individuals/early-journal-content>.

JSTOR is a digital library of academic journals, books, and primary source objects. JSTOR helps people discover, use, and build upon a wide range of content through a powerful research and teaching platform, and preserves this content for future generations. JSTOR is part of ITHAKA, a not-for-profit organization that also includes Ithaka S+R and Portico. For more information about JSTOR, please contact support@jstor.org.

The practice of business is to be considered, not as conclusive, but as evidence of what is reasonable; and business practice demands no such personal examination. Merely to compare cash balances with book balances and to examine collateral securities would take a director more time than can in fairness be asked; and if in addition he were required to make a study of the receivable paper and the specific entries in the ledger no business man would accept the office. In supporting the rule of Briggs v. Spaulding, supra, it must be remembered, moreover, that the rule is not dogmatic; it requires a consideration of all the circumstances of each case; and when circumstances give rise to suspicion it would hold a director culpable in not setting on foot an investigation. Only so long as he acts in good faith can he be protected from liability.

DECLARATIONS OF PHYSICAL CONDITION. — Perhaps no branch of the law of evidence has had such an important development in recent years as the exception to the rule against hearsay in respect to declarations by a person as to his mental or physical condition. This exception, like all exceptions to hearsay, is based on historical grounds rather than on any broad principles of reasoning, and unfortunately its development in our different States has not been uniform. In a recent case in the New Jersey Court of Appeals it was stated that the declarations by the plaintiff of his symptoms made to a physician in order that the latter might give his opinion as witness for the plaintiff, are not admissible. The action for injuries by the plaintiff had already been commenced. Lambertson v. Consolidated Co., 38 Atl. Rep. 683. The court says that statements made to a physician for the purpose of treatment derive "credibility beyond hearsay" because of the strong incentive of a patient to speak truthfully to one about to administer remedies to him. But when the physician is merely to give his opinion for the patient, all incentive to truthfulness is gone, and, instead, "self-interest becomes a motive for distortion, exaggeration, and falsehood."

The Court seems to assume that declarations of symptoms are admissible only when made to a physician for the purpose of treatment; a view which, it must be admitted, has grown up in several States, (see, for example, Grand Rapids R. R. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537.) The better rule, however, seems to be that declarations of physical or mental condition made to any one are admissible as evidence of such condition. (Greenleaf, 15th ed., § 102.) As to the objection that the declarations were post litem motam, that rule, as a rule of exclusion, seems to have been uniformly applied only to declarations as to matters of pedigree or of public and general interest. That the statements, then, in the present case were made for the purpose of enabling the physician to testify for the declarant, and that an action had already been commenced by the latter, would appear rather to detract from the weight of such evidence than to exclude it altogether. The motive for fraud or falsehood in making the declarations would vary according to the circumstances of each case, and the jury, under proper instructions, would judge of the credibility of the evidence.

A LIBERAL CONSTRUCTION OF A MECHANIC'S LIEN LAW.—The object of the Mechanic's Lien Law is "to make the pay of those whose labor has gone to enhance the value of the erection, prompt and secure in all